ABSTRACT

A compiler includes a location-assigning module to optimally allocate register locations in various memory blocks of a memory during compilation of a program code in accordance with code proximity of the program code in accessing the register locations and size of each of the memory blocks.